CHAPTER XIV

Nevertheless, it was a horrible night, and a horrible waking. Things stand so ghastly plain in the face of day.

Yet, blessings on you, friendly Aquarius, who came so welcomely at dawn, with pail after pail of icy torrents, cooling all the fever in my blood, leaving behind, on soul as well as body, a warm, heroic healthy glow. I do believe half the passions, orimes, and miseries of humanity, would be calmed down under the influence of water-cure.

In the hall, quaffing our matutinal glass, in the hall, quaffing our matutinal glass, clear as crystal, refreshing as the clizir viter, my cousin and I met face to face—faces, strange, no doubt, and pallid still, but very different from last night.

No reference to that; temporarily the ghost was laid.

guest was laid.

"Good-morning."

"Good-morning."

"Good-morning. Starting for your walk!

"Its damp, rather."

"Very. Are you for the wood!"

"Probably. And you for the moorland!"

"Ay."

So incitly and

"Probably. And you for the moorland?"

"Ay."

So tacitly we parted. Generally we walked together, but not now.

"Up the hilliside, through the mass of red beech loaves her pony had trampled through thow dead and dank they now lay.

aky would not yield; the rain refused to fail.

I walked for a whole hour pondering. The text of my moditations was Austin's eaving of last night—

"She is my better self. If I lose her, I shall lose my soul."

Now I, weak as my body was, had my soul in my own hand.

I might die—probably I should; but I did not believe that any stroke, however heavy, would drive out of my heart the virtue which her blessed influence had implanted there. Misery might kill me, or (possibly, though I trusted in God's mercy not') might make me a lunatic, but it never would make me a criminal. Him, it might.

I took my determination—at least, for a time—till things altered, or till I saw some dim light. Oh no! Unless I sought for it, how could such a fellow as I hope to see the faintest love-light shining on me from her sweet eyes!

So no wrong to her in that determination of mine.

Again Austin and I met in the midst of a

MERICAN SOCIETY FOR THE PRE

of mine.

Again Austin and I met in the midst of a cluster of cheerful patients—somehow patients always are cheerful at the water-cure. We were cheerful, too. I felt, and something in his voice causing me to look at him hard, showed me he feit, too, an oxtraordinary calm. Traordinary calm.

He followed me to our rooms.

"Alexander, just one word. I have thought over last night, and somewhat changed my mind."

"So have I."

"I shall not speak to her—not just yot."

"Nor I."

Again we looked fixedly at one another— again, hand to hand, we rivals, yet almost ngain, hand to hand, we rivais, yet almost brothers, closed.

"Thank you, Austin."
"You are a good fellow, Fyfe."
"I think," said I, brokenly, "this is right—this is how she would wish lift to be. We must not hate one autother for love of her who has been a saving angel to us both."
"Ay, so she has,"
"Let her be a still—let everything go on a usual till some chance gives either.
